

Arm End headlands is an intact built landscape, one of the last of its kind in greater Hobart that the community can learn from and appreciate.

re imagine arm end reserve the alternative vision

A significant headlands in the River Derwent, this country was an important hunting ground, meeting place, ceremonial site and living place. Rocky Sainty 2013

1. Concept image of interpretative element recognising the cultural significance of the Derwent estuary

Recognition and respect of indigenous cultural heritage will be achieved by integrating:

- Cultural landscape interpretative elements which acknowledge the traditional owners to recognise and educate people about the significance of Arm End as an indigenous cultural site
- Awareness that Arm End is the traditional homelands of the Mumirimina people of the Oyster Bay tribe
- Interventions which protect indigenous artefacts and values such as land art interpretative elements designed by and with people from the Aboriginal community
- Rerouting of tracks to avoid sites of cultural significance such as middens
- Places in the Arm End landscape which reconcile the community such as an aboretum garden bringing together indigenous bush tucker and colonial food plants

Key indigenous cultural landscape elements that make Arm End significant include:

- A wide range of landscape aspects and types, with a wide range of places to shelter
- Opportunities to access land and water
- Extensive middens and concentration of cultural heritage sites
- Geographically central to the estuary with a strong relationship to Kunyani and Bruny

NOTE Interpretative images by way of example only

KEY TO VIEWS

2. Land art element responding to the midden site on Shelly Beach, an opportunity for education about traditional owners and their relationship with country

Establish a Reconciliation arboretum

A collaboratively designed garden that brings European settlement food plants and indigenous bush tucker together in a coastal landscape at the site of the original Gellibrand farm homestead with views to Betsy Island and Ralphs Bay

